Ecology and Control of Introduced Plants The global spread of plant species by humans is both a fascinating large-scale experiment and, in many cases, a major perturbation to native plant communities. Many of the most destructive weeds today have been intentionally introduced to new environments where they have had unexpected and detrimental impacts.

Ecology and Control of Reed Canary Grass (Phalaris arundinacea L.) Chemical methods usually provide poor long-term control of canary grass, and most effective canary grass control techniques are not acceptable in natural areas. Because of the lack of canary grass management information, we have established a field program of control tests. Appended is a bibliography of the literature.

Abstract. Chemicals are the main weapons used in current control programs, however research continues into alternative more sustainable management options. Host plant resistance, crop rotations, conservation of natural enemies, and improved timing of pesticide application would improve the management of these pests.

Vector Control. Application of these measures can, alone or in combination, reduce vector abundance, human-vector contact, and vector infectivity. Steps taken to disrupt the mosquito larval cycle, by larviciding, the use of biological control agents, and environmental modification, will reduce vector abundance.
